1. Based on the passage, the author would be most likely to agree with which of the following?

It is extraordinary that the last years of an English king should receive little attention from generations of historians. Such, however, is the case of James II, who lived the last years of his life in exile in France in a spectacular royal palace of the Baroque period. The most successful biography of James devotes 122 pages to the eight years from 1682 to 1690, while a mere six-and-a-half pages are given to the remaining eleven years of his life.

- (A) A king living in exile deserves less biographical attention than a king who dies while on the throne.
- (B) Generations of historians tend to repeat the successes and failures of their predecessors.
- (C) Under certain conditions, living in exile can be a triumph for a monarch.
- (D) Historians should be careful not to slight important periods of a monarch's life.
- (E) Different biographies tend to give widely varying accounts of aspects of a subject's life.
