> The premise of a classical Chinese garden may seem overwhelmingly exotic: each plant and all building materials are selected for both visual and symbolic value, and the paths and corridors are meant to suggest a contemplative journey. But the way the Chinese garden uses unity, light, texture, and visual barriers and the attention it gives the four seasons are important considerations in every garden.

(A) show how planners of Chinese gardens give attention to the four seasons
(B) dispute the notion that Chinese gardens are similar to other kinds of gardens
(C) provide information about the premise of a classical Chinese garden
(D) indicate that unity and texture are important considerations in planning any garden
(E) argue that smooth navigation through gardens is important
